Important Risk Considerations: There is potential for shortfall in any investment process due to a variety of factors including but not limited to, data and system imperfections, analyst judgment, and the complex nature of designing and implementing portfolio construction systems and other quantitative processes in particular pose broader risk because they may be more pervasive in nature. Furthermore, the Advisor's systems may not necessarily perform in a manner in which they have historically performed or were intended to perform. The Advisor recognizes that such shortfalls are inherent to both fundamental and quantitative processes, and believes that combining both approaches improves the opportunity to reduce these shortfalls. However, these efforts may not necessarily result in the identification of profitable investments or the management of risk.
